Ruminations by John McGlynn:

Underclass

In September 1970 when I began college at the University of Wisconsin in Milwaukee, it was as a Fine Arts and Theater major—a choice for which I was underprepared, especially when compared to my classmates, all of whom had graduated from large urban schools where a career in the arts was deemed to be a viable, even noble, goal, and “the arts” were a well-funded part of high-school curricula. Not so at Weston Union, the lonely, one-storey school on a barren hill halfway between the two-street towns of Cazenovia and Lime Ridge, where I and the other students were urged to pursue vocational careers.

At Weston, “Home of the Silver Eagles,” whose student body numbered no more than 200 during the years I was there (1966–1970), most boys chose as electives such subjects as Automotive Mechanics and Farm Management. Girls opted for Home Education, Consumer Economics, and the like. For extracurricular activities, participation in a sports team and membership in the F.F.A. (Future Farmers of America) were the primary choices for boys. Girls were in the school’s Glee Club or the F.H.A. (Future Homemakers of America). I was an atypical male.

On August 1, 1992, three days after the Australian premier of Cockroach Opera on July 28 at Belvoir Street Theatre in Sydney, friends of Teater Koma and Lontar were hosted at the home of Ian and Dewi Fraser in Melbourne. From left to right: Nano Riantiamo, Peter Barnett, Jan Fraser, Siti Nuraini Barnett, Goenawan Mohamad (partially visible), Barbara Hatley, Adila Suwarno, Ratna Riantiamo, JHM (crouched), Lanita Idrus, Dewi Anggraeni, Umar Kayam, Brian Belcher (squatting), Fikri Jufri.

Continued on page 2
R.A. Kosasih discovered the value of turning legends from the Javanese classic Mahabharata epic into entertaining visual storytelling. During his lifetime, Kosasih published 40 series of comics based on stories from this classic epic, which were eagerly devoured by readers all over the country. There have been other artists since, but Kosasih contributed strongly to the growth of the Indonesian comic industry, which today has been enriched by influences from other countries, such as the Japanese manga comics.

While some may argue against comics becoming mainstream, there is no question that comics have generated great interest among artists and writers who have developed their own ideas of storytelling. A few Indonesians now contribute illustrations for the well-known publishers DC Comics and Marvel Comics. While comics may not be the core output at Lontar, we have produced one title Furniture Salesman Who Became President, a most interesting commentary on local politics. Visit Lontar’s office to pick up this book and a large array of other books in translation.

As we venture into the new year, we wish you all the best in the months ahead and thank you in advance for your continued support and contributions.

Yuli Ismartono
yismartono@lontar.org

Very soon after my arrival in the big city of Milwaukee, I became aware of the fact that, in socio-economic terms, I was a member of the underclass—a farm boy whose parents were unable to provide any financial assistance and who, unlike my classmates, had to work nights and weekends just to make ends meet. When shelving books in the bowels of the U.W. library as part of my work-study program, I often recalled my father’s imprecations against shady statesmen and the well-at-heel who conspire to keep the “have-nots” in place. Until that time I had not realized that my father abjured the status to which he’d been cast within the larger socio-economic sphere and that it had been for that reason, perhaps, that he had raised his children to believe that with a curious mind and the will to work hard, there were no obstacles one could not overcome.

So it was that with my penchant for drama and as a draft-age male vehemently against the war in Viet Nam, I became a diehard fan of Berthold Brecht, whose play Mother Courage and Her Children is definitely one of the greatest anti-war plays of all time. I avidly read English translations of Brecht’s work; drove across the country, from Milwaukee to New Haven, with a trio of Brecht-besotted friends just to see the first U.S. production of his 1929 play, Happy End; and, in 1972, enthusiastically accepted the offer to play a role in a local production of The Threepenny Opera. Brecht’s plays, with their thumb-in-nose attitude towards authority and blatant support of the underclass, struck an immediate cord.

A decade later, in July 1982 I went one night to Taman Ismail Marzuki to see a performance of Time Bomb (Bom Waktu), a new play by Nano Riantiarno. Watching the play, I saw in the script a bit of Shakespeare—the play is partially a love-story and the leading characters are “Roima” and “Julini”—but a lot of Brecht as well. This tragicomedy, populated by members of the underclass—prostitutes, transsexuals, migrant workers, and thieves—and self-serving public officials as well, told me that the playwright was on the side of the underclass, an assumption confirmed...
Titis Retnoningrum Basino or Titis Basino P. I. (Magelang, Central Java, January 17, 1939) graduated from the Faculty of Letters of the University of Indonesia in 1962. She began to write when she was in high school. She was a flight attendant for Garuda Indonesia. In the 1960s, her short stories often appeared in Sastra magazine. Her short stories depict the lives of educated women that take surprising turns when measured against the moral standards of the time. Her short story “Meja Gambar” was translated as “Drafting Table” by Claire Sivensen and published by the Lontar Foundation. Two of her stories, “Rumah Dara” and “Lakilaki dan Cinta,” were published by H. B. Jassin in Angkatan '66, and “Suatu Keputusan” was chosen by Satyagraha Hoerip to be published in Jakarta: 30 Cerita Pendek Indonesia. This last story also received an award from Sastra magazine. After a long silence, Titis began writing again and published a novel, Pelabuhan Hati (1978). Her other novels include a series: Dari Lembah ke Coolibah (1997), Wetas Asih Merengkuh Tajadi (1997), Menyucikan Perselingkuhan (1998) and Mawar Hitam Milik Laras (1999). She received an award from the Center for Language Advocacy and Development for her novel Dari Lembah ke Coolibah in 1998 and the Mastera Award for Literature from the Malaysian government in 1999.

for me the following year when he staged his adaptation of Brecht’s Threepenny Opera under the title Opera Ikan Asin, and then reaffirmed time and again in the years ahead when Teater Koma, his drama troupe, bravely raised issues on stage that were not being given sufficient coverage in the mass media: presidential tenure (Sukses), ethnic discrimination (Sampek Engtay), bloated government bureaucracy (Opera Sembelit), nepotism (Konglomerat Burisrawa), the plight of the marginalized (Opera Juluni), and many more.

Since the time Nano established Teater Koma in 1977, the company has forever been at the forefront in the struggle for a more egalitarian Indonesia and, with the unflagging assistance of Nano’s wife and partner, Ratna Madjid, is today one of the most popular and long-running theatrical companies in Indonesian history. I am honored to have worked with Nano and Ratna several times, starting in 1992 with the publication of Time Bomb and Cockroach Opera. In 1994, I subtitled Nano’s television screenplay, Onah and Her Dreams (Onah dan Impiannya), whose subject was a new underclass, i.e., victims of AIDS. Most recently, in 2018, Teater Koma participated in Lontar’s “Hadhrami Festival,” reading segments from the play Fatimah, whose focus is women’s rights.

As Berthold Brecht demonstrated through his companion plays, Der Jasager and Der Neinsager—The Yes-Sayer and The No-Sayer—there will always be different points of view, but I would like to think that as Nano has done on stage through Teater Koma, I have attempted to do through Lontar, giving voice to the underclass, in this instance, Indonesia’s literary underclass because, in terms of global literary reach, Indonesian literature does indeed fall in that category. This is not for lack of quality but as no doubt my father would have pointed out, for lack of curious minds and the very hard work that it takes to change engrained conditions.

John McGlynn
John_mcglynn@lontar.org
Lontar recently held meetings with PTFI and Cenderawasih University in Jayapura to discuss holding a writing workshop in this Papua provincial capital next February. The workshop will feature published writers sharing their knowledge and experience with students and aspiring authors in Papua, raising their potential in contributing towards local literature and culture, which will be accessible online.

Lara Norgaard's essay "Putu Oka Sukanta and the Hidden Wounds of World History" was awarded runner-up in Asymptote Journal's annual essay contest and published in the journal. In the words of contest judge J. M. Coetzee, "Lara Norgaard makes a compelling case that [Putu Oka Sukanta's] work should not be judged by Western aesthetic standards, which prize the fully achieved single art-work, but rather should be read in toto as the record of an evolving meditation on Indonesia in our times."

https://www.asymptotejournal.com/special-feature/lara-norgaard-on-putu-oka-sukanta/

The emergence of women writers after the revolution reflected the continuing development of the short story form. Titis Basino explored the inner world of women with special emphasis on several issues. Titis Basino, in her story "I Saw Her Smile," plunges into the value of a mother in a child's life with issues of accepting a mother who lives in a mental asylum.